BRAND + UX/IA REDESIGN OF A LIVE PRODUCT

REP.TOOLS

A toolkit for the reps community. The homepage was still shaped like launch day; the product underneath had become a storefront.

WHAT IT IS

A LIVE PRODUCT WITH A REAL AUDIENCE.

rep.tools is a toolkit for people buying replica fashion through Chinese shopping agents: a catalogue, parcel tracking, QC photo lookup and converters. The founder built and ships it; I redesigned the brand, the structure and the experience.

WHAT IT IS

02

THE CATALOGUE WAS NOT ON THE HOMEPAGE.

It launched as a landing page, and for a launch that was right. Then the catalogue grew to 6,900 items and the page never caught up. The thing people came for sat one click behind Browse Products, while the page above it kept pitching to people who had already decided.

Generic dark-SaaS styling said startup, not shop.

NOT "MAKE IT PRETTIER." MAKE THE SITE BEHAVE LIKE WHAT IT HAD BECOME.

01 Almost everyone arrives on a phone, straight from a video.
Mobile is the primary surface, not a fallback.

02 They arrive already fluent.
QC, batches, agents, hauls: nobody needs the vocabulary explained.

03 The product is the catalogue.
So the homepage should be the catalogue.

THREE WAYS TO GO. ONE THAT FIT.

CONSIDERED

KEEP THE SAAS
LOOK, SURFACE
THE CATALOGUE

Fixes the structure. Leaves the site looking like a tool built for someone else.

Structure only

CONSIDERED

FULL HYPE-DROP.
ALL POSTER, NO
CHROME

Fits the streetwear half of the culture. Fails the logistics half, where a tracking number has to be legible at a glance.

Identity only

CHOSEN

SPEAK THE CULTURE, KEEP THE DATA READABLE

Poster caps for headlines, cyan on near-black, mono for anything that behaves like data. Hard edges. A QC PASSED stamp, because that is the moment this community cares about.

RULES

Hard edges, no pills. Counts on everything. One accent, used for state and action only.

THE HOMEPAGE IS NOW THE CATALOGUE.

HOMEPAGE

07

MOBILE FIRST

WHERE NEARLY ALL THE TRAFFIC LANDS.

Category rows scroll by thumb. Filter chips wrap instead of collapsing into a menu. The counted category bar stays visible rather than hiding behind a hamburger.

A page that pitches becomes a page you can shop.

BUILT FOR 6,907 ITEMS, NOT SIX.

Sidebar and a paginated 3-up grid become a counted category bar, a five-column grid, and the controls a catalogue this size needs: search, price range, sort, currency, reset, favourites. Product pages did not exist before; now every item has somewhere to live.

FIVE FEATURES BECAME ONE TOOLKIT.

Track, QC photos, convert, calculators, find: consolidated into a single tabbed surface, so the utilities read as one product instead of five competing on a page.

ONE STYLESHEET. EVERY PAGE INHERITS IT.

Before, every template carried its own inline styles; a new identity applied that way would have drifted apart within a month. The identity now lives in one shared stylesheet with nav and footer as partials, so the founder can ship new pages without re-deciding the design each time.

PAGES WITH THEIR OWN STYLES

LIVE AND IN USE.

The redesign is what visitors land on today, sent there by a channel with 300k+ followers. The original design was not bad work; it was work that had been outgrown. Most of the job was noticing that gap, then making the interface behave like what the thing had actually become.

Next: a number. Catalogue click-through and mobile time-on-site, before and after, from the founder's analytics.
